C · READING /10

Read the passage, then answer the questions on the next page.

When the only reading room in their neighbourhood closed for repairs, a group of final-year pupils in Bafoussam decided to create a temporary book exchange. Their first idea was simple: every member would bring a book and borrow another. Yet a meeting with younger pupils revealed a problem. Some families owned no books to contribute. If membership depended on a donation, the project would exclude precisely the readers who needed it most.

The organisers therefore changed the rule. Anyone could borrow a book after registering with the volunteer on duty. Donations were welcome but not compulsory. A local shopkeeper offered two shelves, while a retired teacher helped the group classify the books. The pupils kept a record of loans in a notebook. They deliberately avoided publishing borrowers' names online, explaining that public recognition should not come at the expense of privacy.

After a month, the group had received sixty books. However, the number alone did not tell the whole story. Several books were too damaged to use, and most were written for adults. The volunteers began asking potential donors for suitable material rather than simply requesting more donations. They also introduced a weekly reading session in which older pupils helped younger readers discuss a short passage. The sessions were not intended to replace lessons. Their purpose was to make reading a shared activity rather than an isolated task.

Not everything worked immediately. Some books were returned late, and volunteers occasionally forgot their duties. Instead of blaming borrowers in public, the group introduced private reminders and a simple rota. Attendance improved, although the organisers could not yet tell whether the project had raised examination results. They had not collected evidence that would support such a claim.

At the end of the term, the pupils wrote a report for the neighbourhood committee. They described the difficulties as carefully as the successes and asked for a dry storage space during the rainy season. Their conclusion was modest: a useful community project does not depend only on enthusiasm. It also needs rules that include people, records that reveal problems and volunteers willing to change their plans.

C · READING — QUESTIONS

1. Why did the organisers change their original membership rule? (2 points)

2. Mention two forms of support provided by adults. (2 points)

3. Why was the total number of donated books an incomplete measure of success? (2 points)

4. What evidence shows that the group respected borrowers' privacy? (2 points)

5. Can the organisers claim that examination results improved? Explain. (2 points)

D · COMPOSITION /10

Your school wants to start a community learning project. Write a proposal of 200–250 words describing the need, two practical activities, how you would include pupils with limited resources, and how you would assess the project. Do not simply retell the passage.
