C · READING /10

Read the passage, then answer the questions on the next page.

A message claiming that all lessons would be cancelled on Friday spread through a school discussion group on Wednesday evening. It carried the school’s name and a familiar photograph of the entrance. Within an hour, several pupils had forwarded it to relatives. Some were relieved because they had not finished an assignment. Others worried about missing a practical lesson that could not easily be repeated.

Mado, one of the editors of the school newsletter, noticed that the message contained no date or signature. The photograph seemed genuine, but that did not prove the announcement was current. She asked the sender where it had come from. He explained that he had copied it from another group and had assumed that someone else had checked it. Mado then contacted the school office through its usual public channel rather than using the telephone number printed in the message.

The office confirmed that lessons would continue normally. The photograph had accompanied an announcement about repairs the previous year. Someone had removed the original date, and the old announcement had acquired a new meaning as it travelled between groups. Mado wrote a correction, explaining both the official response and the steps she had taken to obtain it. She did not identify the pupil who had first shared the message with her. Her aim was to correct the claim, not to invite public humiliation.

The correction travelled more slowly than the original message. A few pupils said that checking every story would take too much time. During a discussion the next day, Mado agreed that nobody could investigate everything in depth. However, she argued that a claim affecting attendance, money or personal information deserved extra care. Pausing before forwarding it could prevent a larger problem later.

The newsletter team subsequently produced a short checklist: look for a date, identify the original source, compare the claim with a reliable channel and distinguish a photograph from the interpretation attached to it. The checklist did not promise to make readers immune to mistakes. It was intended to make verification a habit, especially when a message seemed unusually convenient, frightening or urgent.

C · READING — QUESTIONS

1. Give two details that made Mado question the message. (2 points)

2. How did Mado obtain a reliable confirmation? (2 points)

3. Explain how an old photograph contributed to a misleading message. (2 points)

4. Why did Mado avoid identifying the pupil who shared the message? (2 points)

5. What limitation of the checklist does the final paragraph acknowledge? (2 points)

D · COMPOSITION /10

Write an article of 200–250 words for your school newsletter on responsible use of online information. Explain two risks, propose two practical verification habits, and discuss one difficulty pupils may face. Give your article a suitable title.
